Practical Ideas and Strategies

As a Speech-Language Pathologist, your expertise in oral language and literacy skills makes you an invaluable member of the literacy team at your school and in your online sessions and meetings. In this seminar, MARIBETH PLANKERS, an experienced Speech-Language Pathologist and Assistive Technology Professional, will share practical methods for assessing and treating reading and writing skills in students with language disorders. You will learn effective, efficient and easy-to-implement techniques to identify children who are at risk for problems with decoding, reading comprehension and written language. MariBeth will share with you evidence-based practices, from the ASHA (2016) evidence-based triangle, about the language skills that strongly predict learning deficits across settings and situations and provide strategies that will address these language skills in your daily therapy. This seminar will focus on practical strategies that can be implemented in the context of therapy, as well as generalizing across settings and situations.

You will leave with numerous ideas for reading comprehension, writing, language, and games to assist students with moderate to severe reading, writing and language deficits, as well as ways to maximize your effectiveness as an SLP.

Join MariBeth for a fast-paced, engaging seminar with practical, highly effective techniques you can use with the children you see and treat.

Dear Colleague:

For many years, I have worked with students who have a language disorder which leads to challenges in reading and writing. Knowing my own personal passion for reading and writing, I can't imagine any skill more important to teach! When I initially started working on literacy skills with students, I was frequently asked why the SLP should have anything to do with a student's reading growth. Our educational background and expertise in language is even more reason for the SLP to be highly involved with reading and writing. Over the years our role as SLPs has expanded, and our expertise in language and literacy is now more widely acknowledged. We can assist with spelling, reading fluency and most importantly, reading comprehension and writing language.

It is imperative that we demonstrate a practical approach to addressing literacy skills along with our oral language goals. We don't need more work but do need to address reading in the context of our current therapy programs. Our role is to provide effective strategies to teach other specialists what we know about language and literacy.

I have developed this seminar to share with you the best practices that we, as SLPs and other specialists, can use to support students with language and literacy deficits. We will explore the alignment of oral language and literacy skills and how valuable your expertise is to the school IEP team. We will explore the different types of reading challenges that your students with language disorders encounter across the curriculum. The emphasis will be on practical, doable methods to evaluate students and to develop individualized planned programs that may be implemented through direct intervention, the general education classroom and consultation.

My goal for this seminar is to send you back to your schools and online learning communities empowered with many new ideas you can put to practice immediately! We can lower the barriers in order to raise the level of success for our students.

Sincerely,

MariBeth Plankers, M.S. CCC-SLP, ATP

P.S. I know how valuable your time is, so my focus for the day will be on sharing practical strategies that work in today's traditional or virtual schools with today's students.

"My goal for this seminar is to send you back to your schools and online learning communities empowered with many new ideas you can put to practice immediately!"
